MECHANISMS OF HYDRATION

The human body is composed of 60% water, 20% of which is contained in the skin, making it a real reservoir. However, every day we lose more than 2.5 litres of water through various natural mechanisms such as perspiration, urine and insensible water loss (IWL). The latter represents about 0.4 of water that evaporates every 24 hours for normal skin. Skin hydration depends on two main factors:

THE SURFACE HYDROLIPIDIC FILM [THE SKIN'S PROTECTIVE SHIELD]:

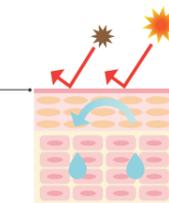

The protective film on the surface of our skin is made up of a mixture of sebum, sweat and other lipids. It limits insensible water loss and helps to maintain good hydration. The hydrolipidic film also provides a barrier against external aggressors, mainly UV sun exposure, cold, hard water and pollution.

Without strong protection, skin is more vulnerable to the premature appearance of fine lines and loss of tone. To restore good skin hydration, it is necessary to strengthen the hydrolipidic film and increase the presence of hyaluronic acid in the body.

NORMAL SKIN

INTACT HYDROLIPIDIC FILM

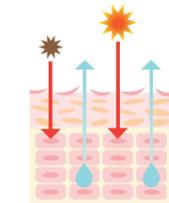

- UV and external aggressors partially stopped
- Retained water

DRY SKIN

COMPROMISED HYDROLIPIDIC FILM

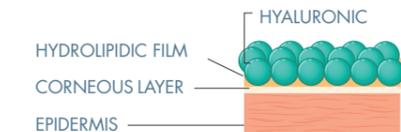

- UV and external aggressors penetrate
- Evaporation of water

HYALURONIC ACID [HA], THE SPONGE MOLECULE:

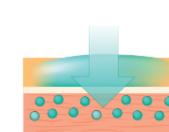

HA is a protein that is naturally present in our bodies and captures water before it evaporates from the surface of the epidermis. HA molecules can retain up to 1,000 times their weight in water.

Hyaluronic Acid is present in different molecular weights in the skin:

High molecular weight:

- tensor effect [reduction of the wrinkle depth]
- creates a protective film
- limits water loss

Medium molecular weight:

- long-lasting moisturising ability

Low molecular weight:

- rapid hydration
- acts in the deep layers of the epidermis
